Conference Theme

Rare earth elements (REEs) are widely used in high technology. They are essential components of many modern products, including electronic devices. During the past 30 years, mining and processing of REE ores, technology for separation of raw mixtures, and the production of pure elements have been developed in order to create and generate more and more high-tech devices. There has been an explosion in demand for many items that require rare earth elements. The production of REEs could well be realized by the development of powerful analytical methods in order to characterize the elements and also to control the processes during production.
